

ABSTRACT

A data scrambler receives a parallel array of input bits. An array of previously scrambled output bits are stored from a previous clock period. The array of previously scrambled output bits are applied to the parallel array of input bits during a same current clock period to generate a current array of scrambled output bits.